Henry's

LAST STAND

“HENRY WATSON, for the seventh and last time, are you going upstairs to change or not?”

From his mother's tone of voice, Henry realized that this time, she meant business! Sighing loudly enough for her to hear, he began to put the tools he had been tinkering with back in the chest. “What's wrong with what I'm wearing?” he demanded in an aggrieved voice. “Gosh, they're just a little torn, but they're almost clean...”

“Henry Watson!” This time, his mother bothered to come out of the kitchen so she could confront him, pointing scornfully at his well-worn levis. “Without further argument, you will remove those disgraceful pants and change to your good suit! And a white shirt! And a tie!” She marched back into the kitchen, pausing only to add a further instruction. “And brush your hair!”

Up in his room, Henry gave way to his deep misery. “Just because Pop's boss is coming to dinner! Gosh! Who cares about him? And to think I even had to miss the club meeting on account of that old fuddy-duddy! Ah... phooey!” He directed a kick at his worn levis, which lay crumpled on the floor, and proceeded, much against his will, to get into his navy blue suit.

Below, in the kitchen, Henry's mother was worried and saying so. “I'm afraid I just can't understand that boy these days!” she said to Henry's father, who was busy sampling the dinner in advance. “Why, he's no more than a wild Indian!”

“Cake's good,” Henry's father commented, breaking a corner of icing away and popping it into his mouth.

her discussion of their son. “Isn't it time Henry grew up and learned to behave himself in company? Honestly, the way he fussed about getting dressed tonight, you'd think he was being tortured!”

“You worry too much,” Henry's father said, smiling. “I guess Henry will grow up. Lots of people seem to.”

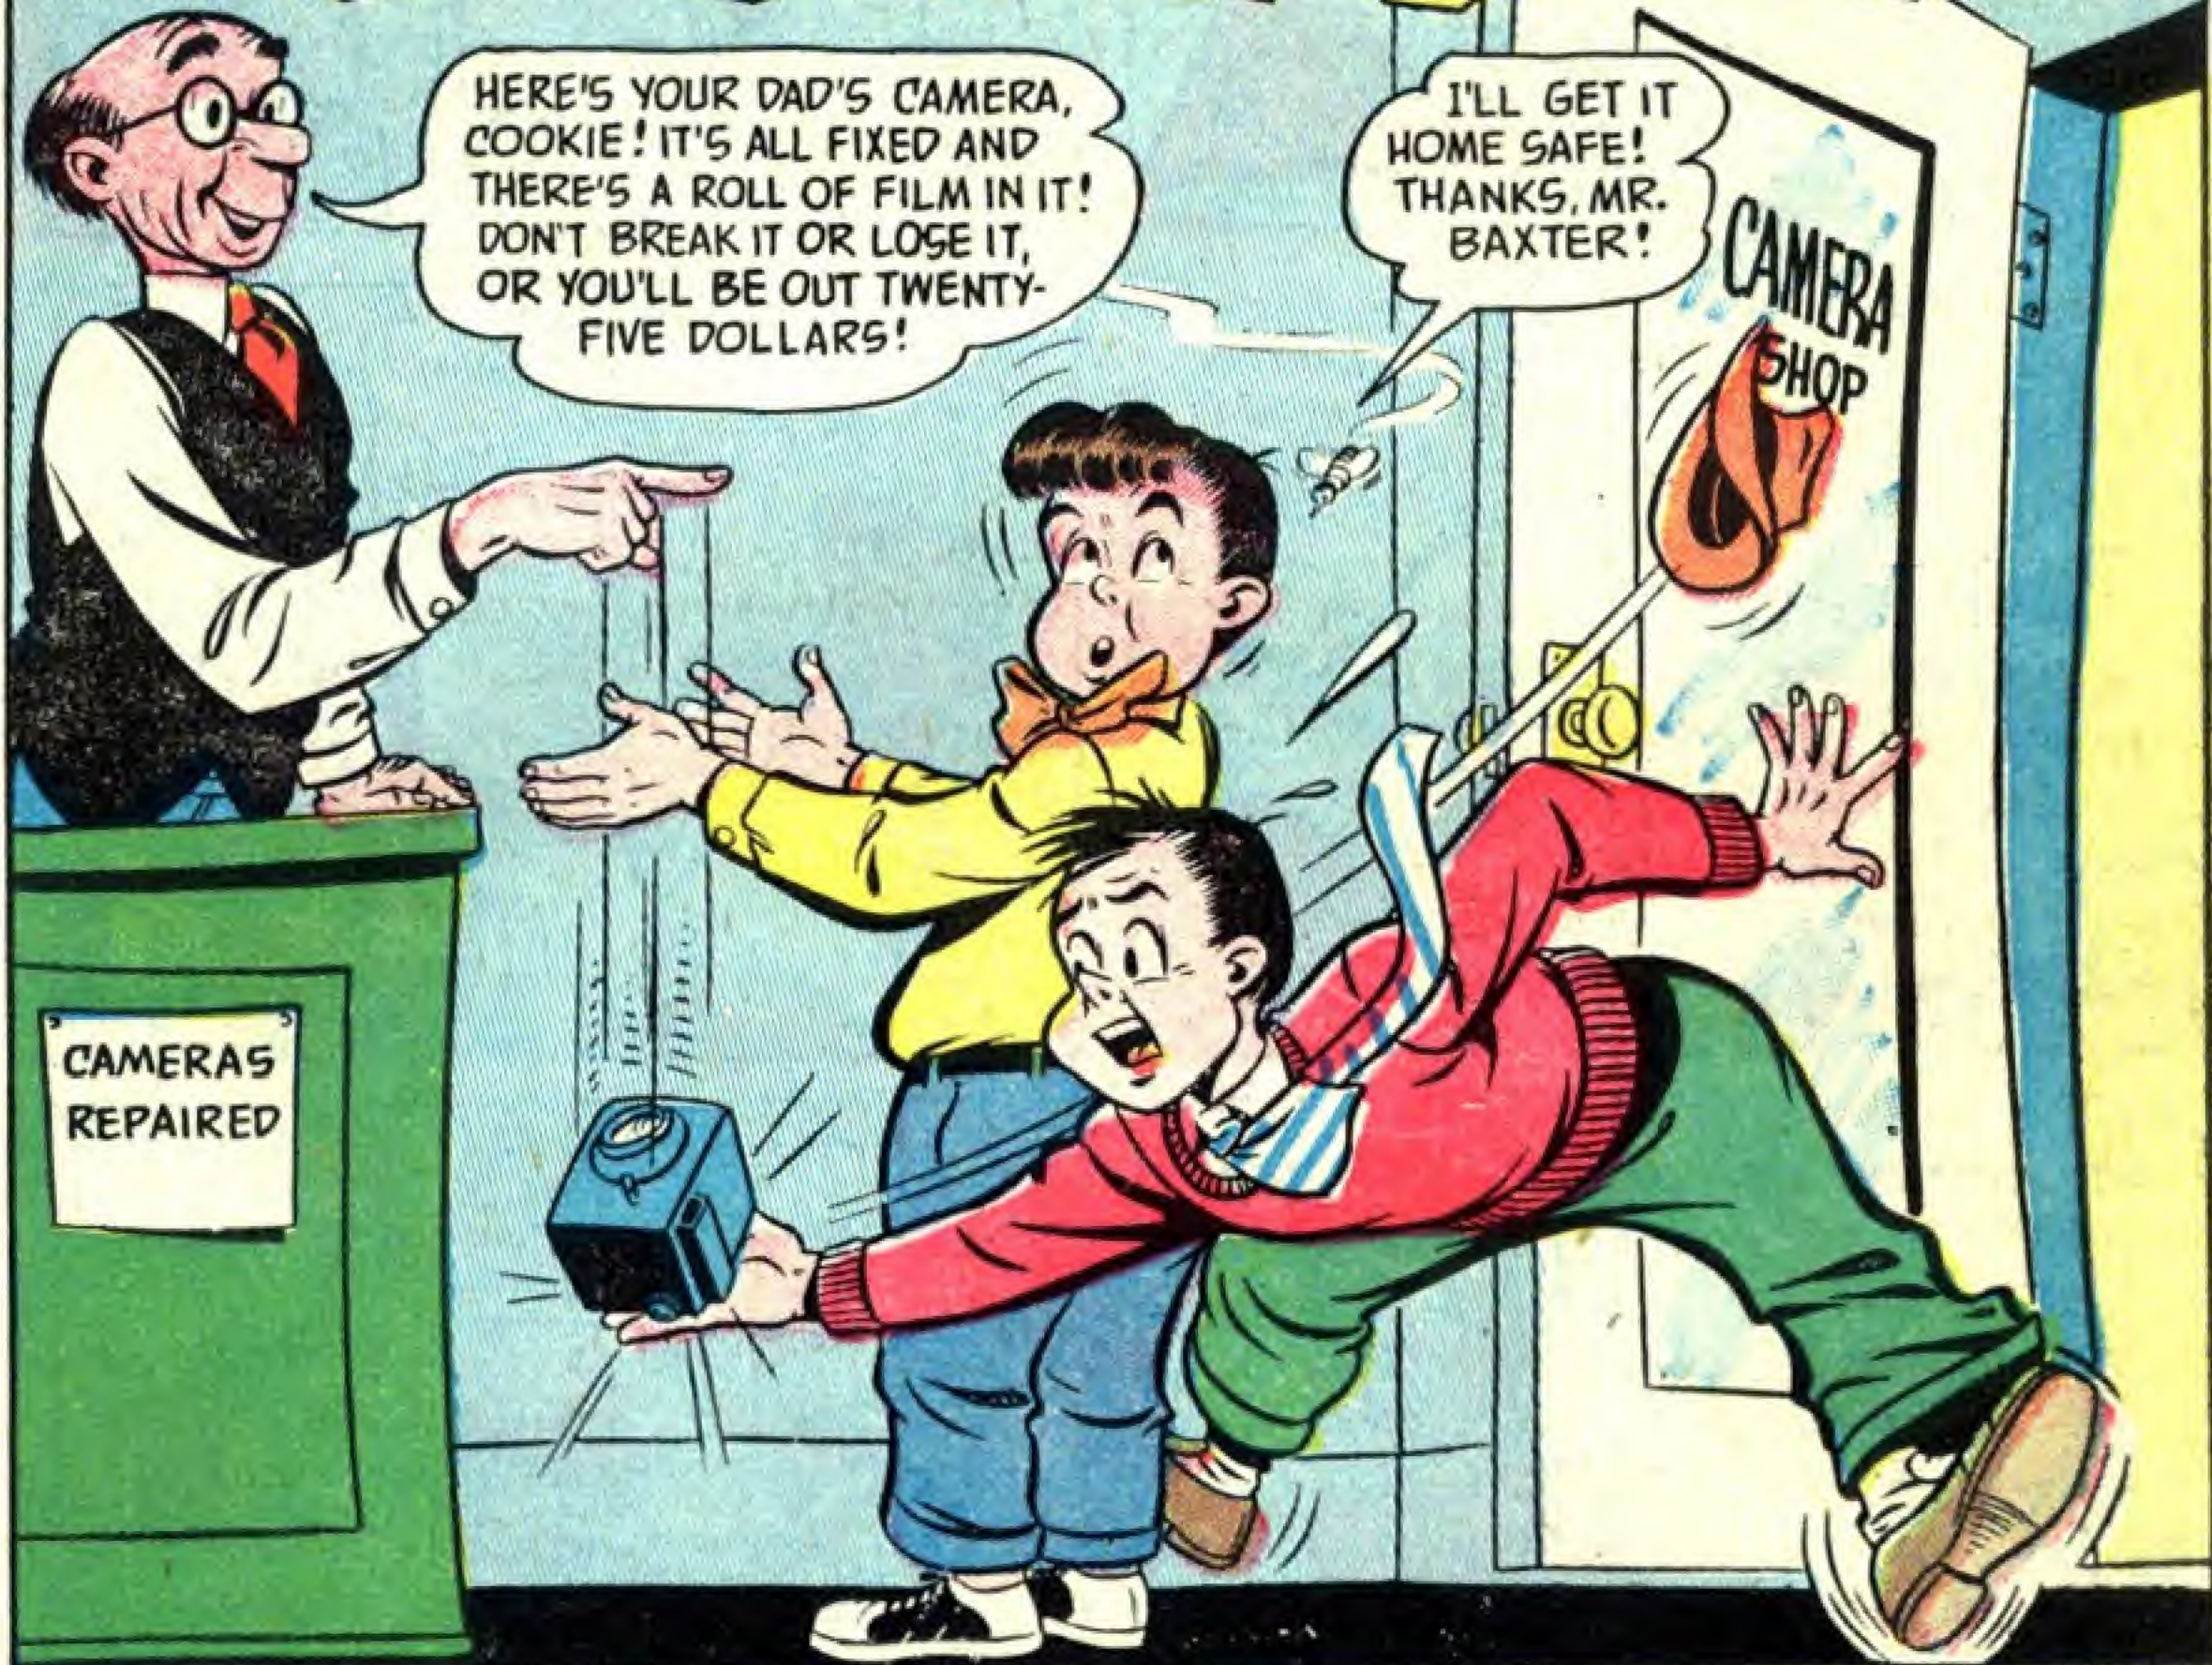

At exactly seven o'clock, the doorbell rang. There was Henry's father's boss, Mr. Cranshaw, sniffing the cooking smells appreciatively. And there was Mrs. Cranshaw, the boss' wife, chirping blithe hellos. And there was...there was...! Henry gulped, looked... and looked again! There seemed to be a Miss Cranshaw! Elizabeth, her name was! How could such an old fuddy-duddy have a daughter who looked like an angel and smiled so sweetly, that Henry's heart seemed to become a great glob of marshmallow as he was introduced to her!

“Shall we go in to dinner?” said Henry's mother. She cast a warning glance at Henry, to make certain he was paying attention. But the warning stopped short of its mark, turning to a look of astonishment.

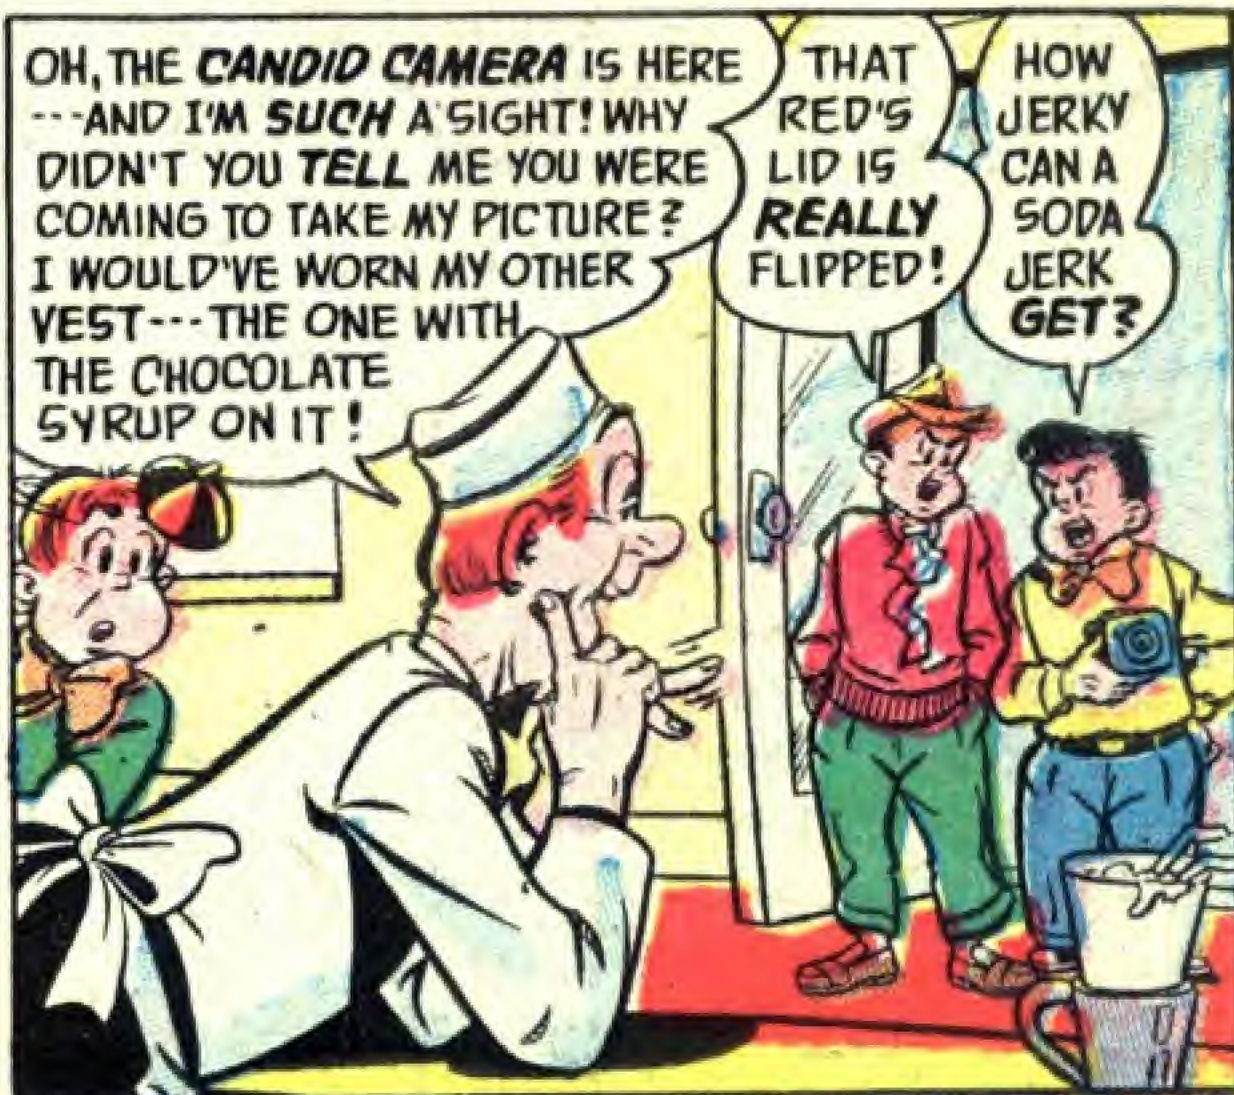

“Here, let me...” Henry, her son, the wild Indian, was awkwardly helping Elizabeth Cranshaw to her seat, standing behind her, seeing she was comfortably seated! He was smiling at her! True, he had sort of a glazed, feverish look...that might explain it! Maybe Henry was sick! And when Henry seated himself near Elizabeth and passed her things and offered to show her his stamp collection, Mrs. Watson was sure he was sick.

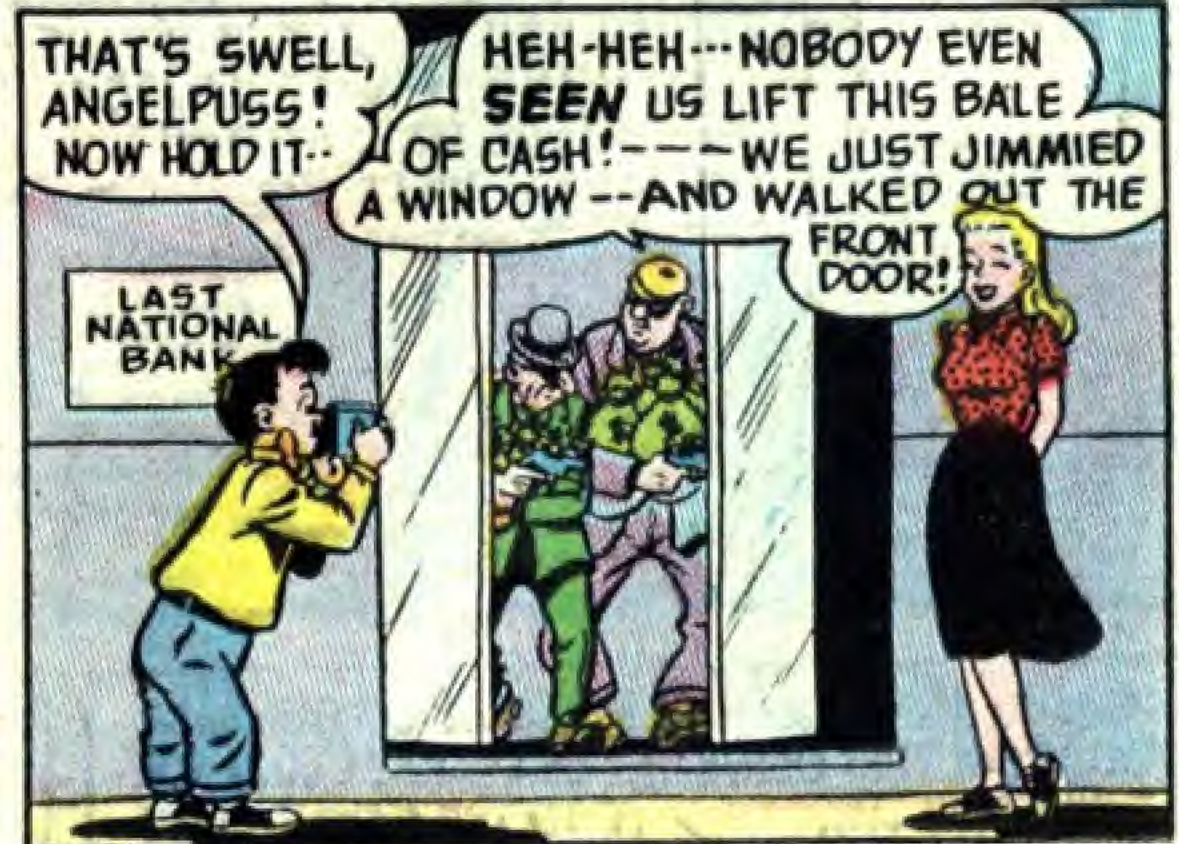

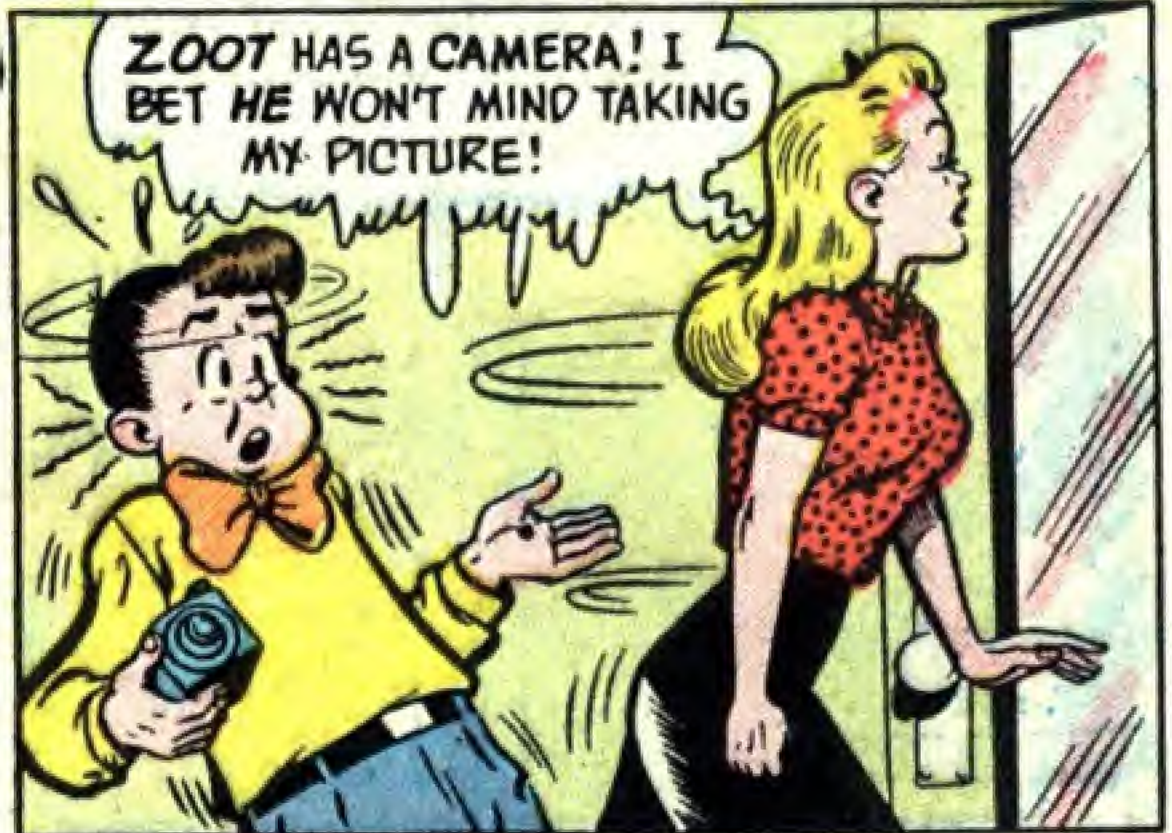

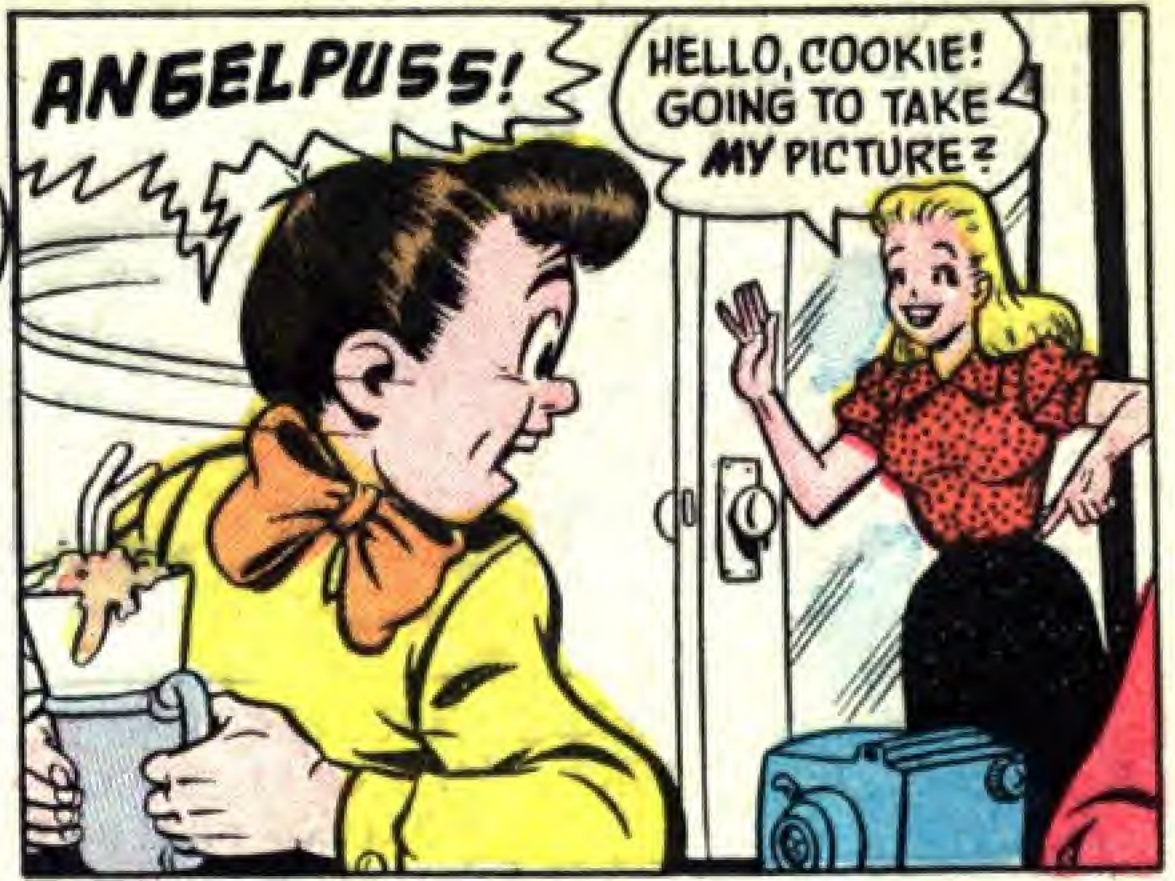

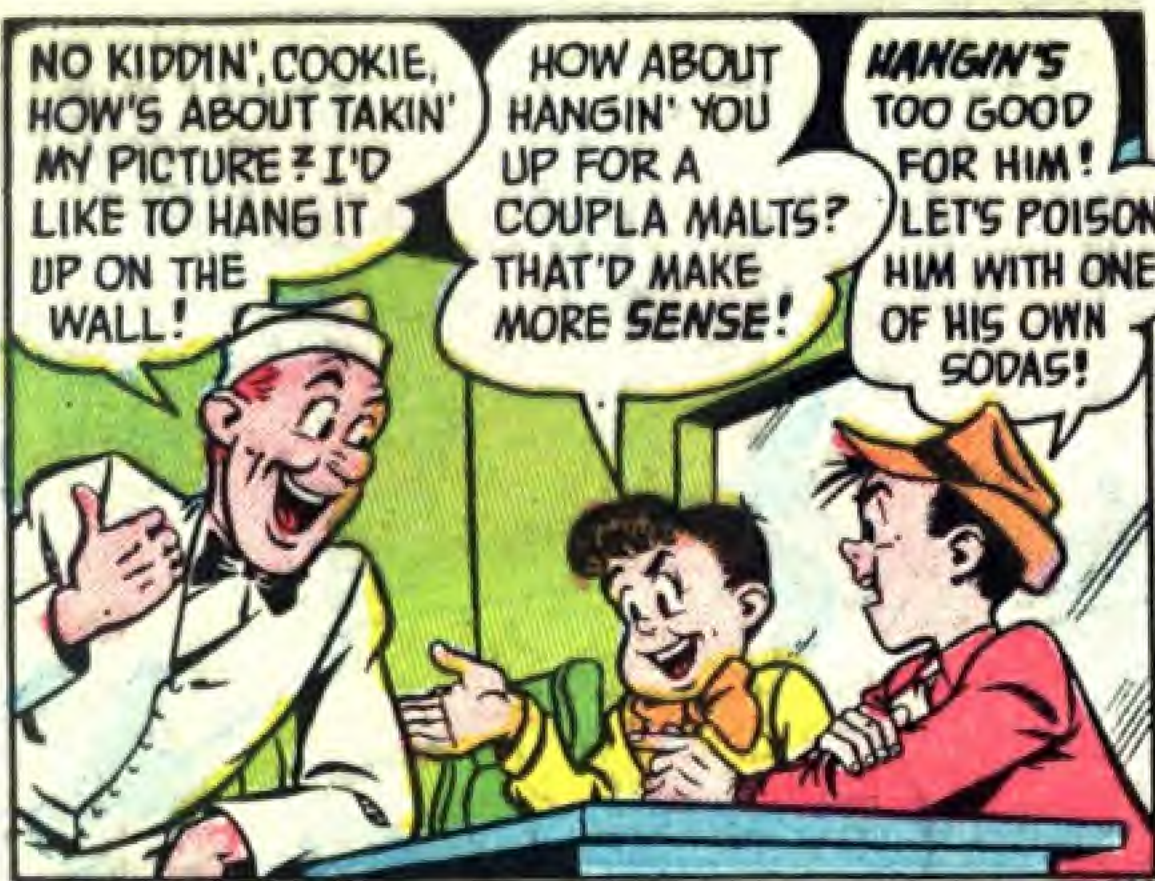

But Mr. Watson knew better! “As I said, dear, he'll grow up! All it takes is a pretty girl at the right time! Pass the butter?”

"ROD GOWAN!" Gwen's voice rose in a squeak of disbelief. "You mean you have a date with Rod Gowan? Why, I wouldn't go out with him in a million years!"

Cindy felt funny in the pit of her stomach. Perhaps she had made a mistake in dating Rod Gowan! But he'd seemed so nice... "Why, Gwen? Why wouldn't you date him? What's wrong with him?"

Gwen looked superior, as though she knew something Cindy ought to know, but didn't. "Because he's just a bad sport and stingy, if you must know!"

"Did...did you ever go out with him?" Cindy ventured timidly.

"I should say not! But if you don't believe me, ask any of the girls! They'll tell you the same thing, so there!"

Cindy felt just awful as she walked slowly home from school. If Rod was so terrible, maybe she could get out of the date somehow! Gwen had certainly made him seem unpleasant enough! Half-way down the street, she caught up with Lucille Peabody and Lois Jenkins. They were giggling about something, but stopped when she joined them.

"We hear you have a date with Rod Gowan!" Lucille said.

Lois smothered another giggle, and Cindy knew they'd been laughing at her! "Yes, I have," she admitted reluctantly, "but I had no idea he was so awful!"

"Everybody knows it," Lois said, and her face wore that same expression of superiority that Cindy had seen on Gwen. "Too bad you didn't!"

"Did you...or Lucille...ever date him?" Cindy spoke shyly, for fear she might offend them.

"No!" "Of course not!" The girls answered in a chorus, looking disdain-ful. "But Ellen Buhl went out with him and she had lots to say about Rod Gowan!" Lois offered. "He wouldn't take her anywhere she wanted to go and he didn't even take her home!"

That last thrust was a telling one! Later, as Cindy awaited the arrival of Rod Gowan, she thought, "I'll just go through with it and never date him again! Ellen Buhl...I don't believe I ever met her, but I sure feel sorry for her, not even being taken home! I'm glad I'm prepared!"

Perhaps Cindy thought she was prepared, but if she was, it was for the wrong kind of date! For Rod turned out to be just swell! They went to the movies first, sharing three bags of popcorn between them, and later, Rod treated to sodas. They had plenty to talk and laugh about, and Cindy found herself having a fine time! Then, to make things just perfect, Rod said, "Getting close to curfew time! I'd better get you home!"

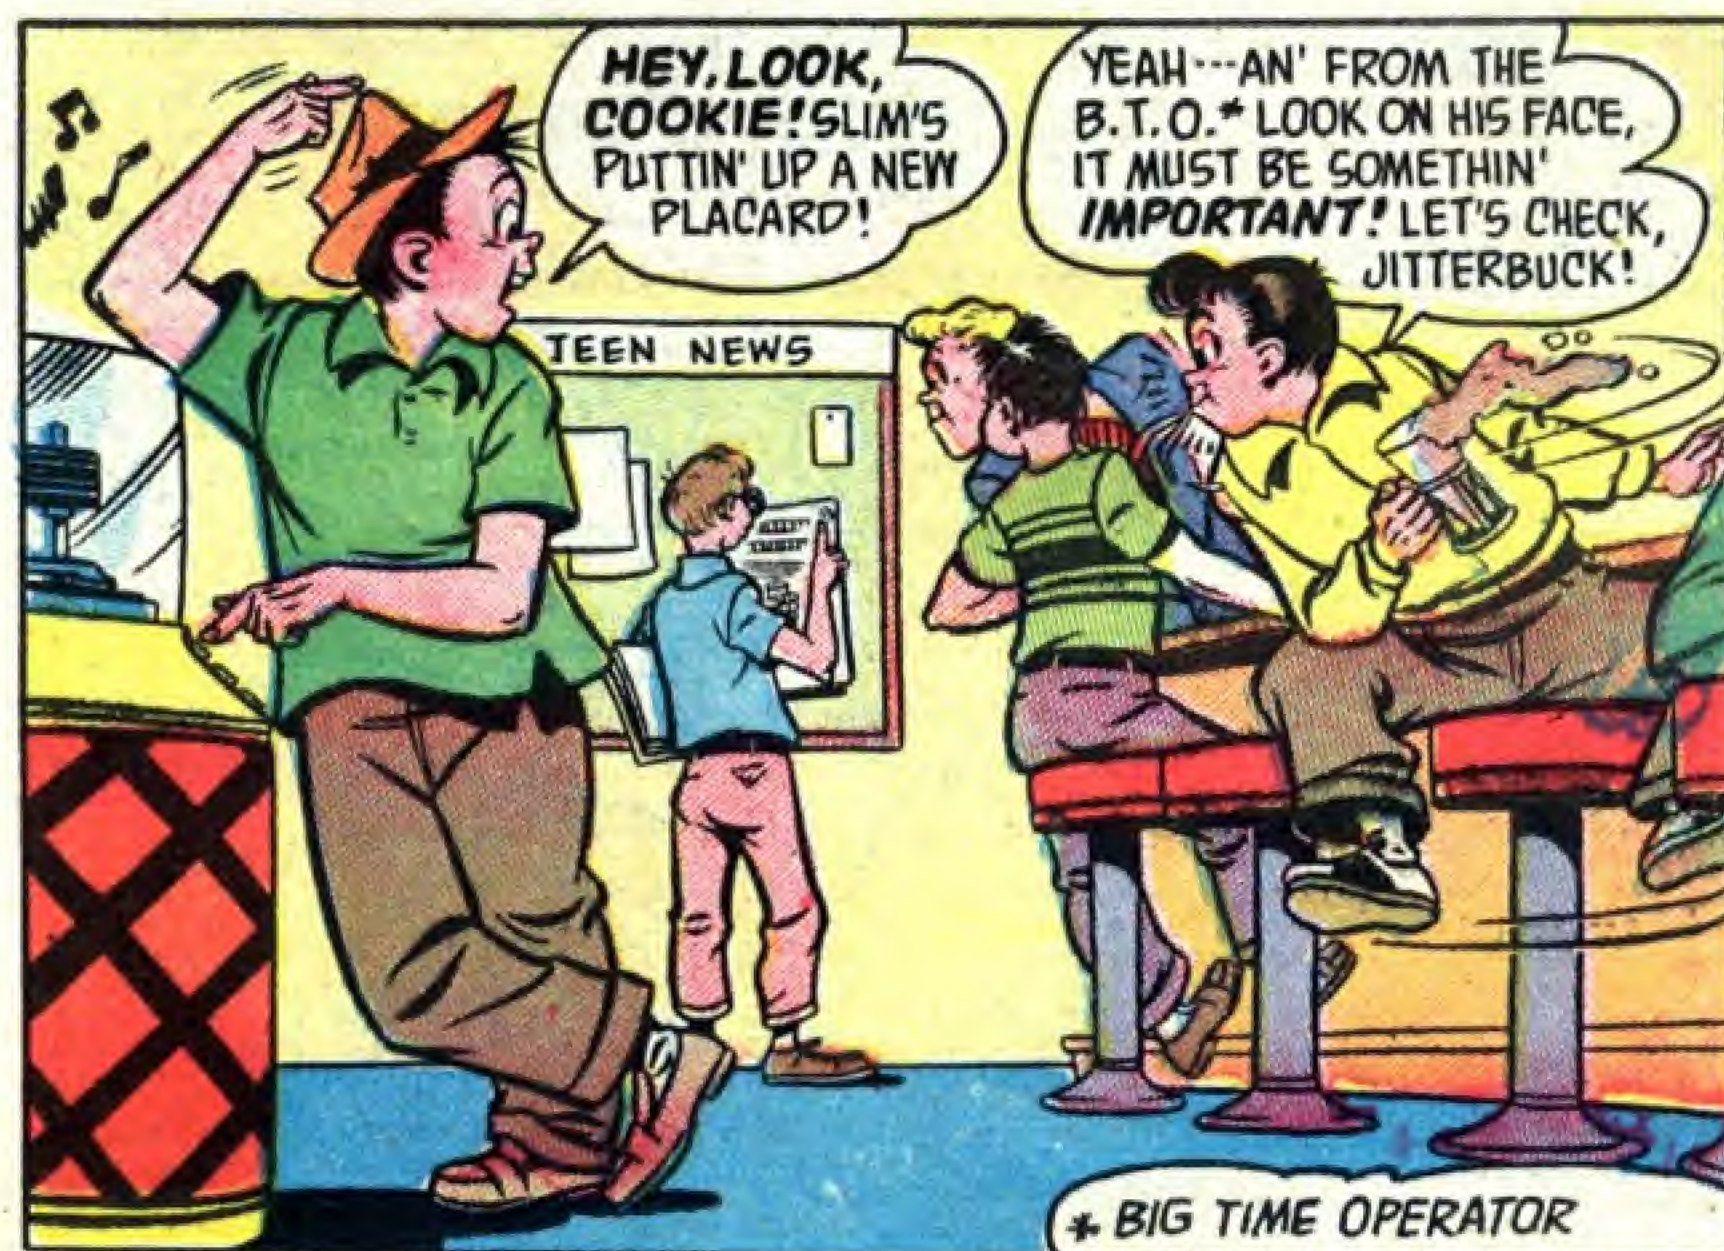

Impulsively, Cindy said, "Let's walk!" There was something on her mind, puzzling her. She simply had to find out, even if it meant seeming to pry and snoop. "Rod," she asked, "did you ever date a girl named Ellen Buhl?"

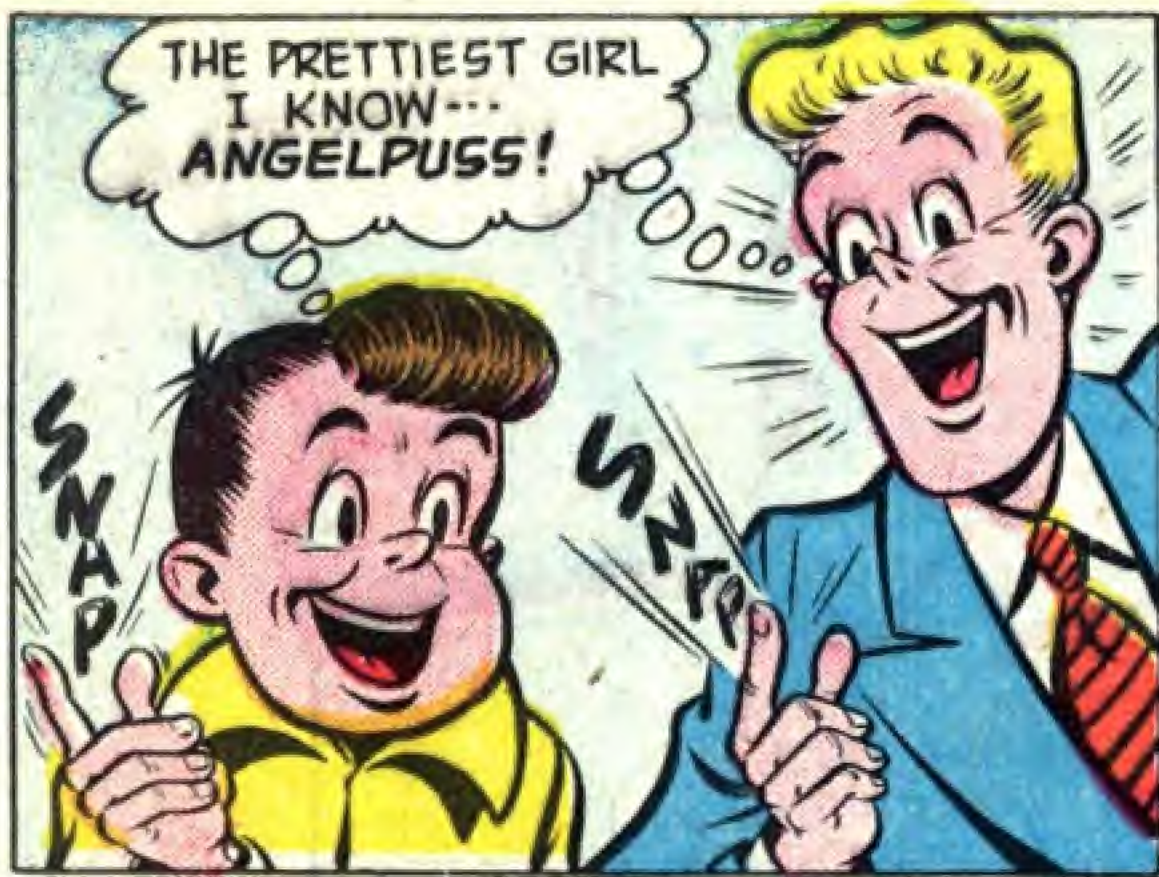

"Mmm-hmm." Rod's answer was brief and noncommittal.

"Was she...well...peculiar?"

Rod hesitated and then said, choosing his words carefully, "I don't want to say anything bad about Ellen, but she's very rich, you know! Spoiled! She wanted to have dinner at the Claridge and go to a formal dance afterwards, and gosh! It was just a weekday and I couldn't..."

Cindy understood. She understood a lot. "Never mind," she told Rod, feeling wise to the ways of gossip, "I believe in seeing for myself!"
